The didactic approach to teaching has become a thing of the past for the staff and students of NUIG's engineering faculty – the university's remarkable redeveloping building is alive and in continuous communication with its inhabitants, writes John Holden.

The living, breathing heart of learning

The didactic approach to teaching has become a thing of the past for the staff and students of NUIG's engineering faculty – the university's remarkable redeveloping building is alive and in continuous communication with its inhabitants, writes John Holden.

The living, breathing heart of learning

The didactic approach to teaching has become a thing of the past for the staff and students of NUIG's engineering faculty – the university's remarkable redeveloping building is alive and in continuous communication with its inhabitants, writes John Holden.

The living, breathing heart of learning

The didactic approach to teaching has become a thing of the past for the staff and students of NUIG's engineering faculty – the university's remarkable redeveloping building is alive and in continuous communication with its inhabitants, writes John Holden.

The living, breathing heart of learning